Hancock Administration’s First 100 Days in Office
A Letter to the Community

“Delivering a world-class city where everyone matters”

Dear Neighbor:

Today marks my 100th day in office, and I want to say thank you to all of the Denver residents and City employees who are working hard to shape our agenda and contribute to our early achievements.

We’ve hit the ground running on four key priorities: bringing fiscal sustainability to city government; driving private-sector economic growth to create jobs; improving education and other opportunities for all kids; and beginning to restore public trust and confidence in our Police Department.

Thanks to you, we’ve taken important first steps toward delivering a world-class city where everyone matters.

Nowhere is this more evident than in the unprecedented level of community outreach and public input we are engaged in. On Saturday, we hosted our first citywide Community Forum, and over the past 100 days, my team and I have taken part in more than 130 neighborhood events and meetings throughout Denver’s diverse neighborhoods.

Our progress over the past 100 days will position us for even greater achievements over the next four years.

What’s ahead? By the end of the year, we will have established a focused economic development strategy for Denver, appointed a Children’s Affairs director and named a new Police Chief.
I invite you to explore further the work we’ve done over the past 100 days by going to the Mayor’s page on the denvergov.org website. There, you’ll find a deeper and broader overview of the hard work we’ve accomplished together. I also encourage you to join me and my team in the work of delivering that world-class city by signing up to receive email alerts.

While we face tremendous challenges ahead, we have within our grasp all we need to succeed.

Please join us as we work together to deliver a world-class city where everyone truly matters.

Thank you.

Respectfully,

Michael B. Hancock
Mayor
