“I think we could really utilize the fact that the park is smack dab in the middle of Downtown - no matter where you’re headed in Downtown, it won’t be hard to stop by the park... Everyone thinks of Denver as an outdoor town, an urban outdoor city, lots to do both in and out, and active.”

People. Participants talked about wanting to engage with the park on a daily, weekly, monthly and annual basis. They want to see issues of diversity, safety, equity, access and inclusion addressed for park users today, as well as into the future. They are also seeking a park design that is truly representative of the Denver community.

“Grab a coffee, have places to eat, conduct a meeting outside, meet with teams; or a place to step away from the screen, go for a walk.”

Place. Participants talked about the physical quality of the space itself and what makes it special: its context, its events, its urban design elements. They discussed mobility, connectivity and placemaking ideas that could inspire the short- and long-term success of the park.

“The park feels gray and desolate, how could it be more welcoming visually and experiential... can provide moments of pause, both intimate and civic.”

Lifestyle. Participants want to ensure that the space is authentic and contemporary, comprised of a variety of arts and culture, recreation, performing arts, media, health and wellness, nature and outdoor programming.

“The outdoor lifestyle is really important to Denverites – in all seasons... making it a 4 season park could be powerful.”

We asked the public a series of questions regarding the Social, Cultural, Recreational, Sustainable and Connected aspects of what they wanted to see at Skyline Park. We would love to hear more from you on these ideas. Please cast your vote online at www.surveymonkey.com/r/skylineparksurvey
