tempt to worm their way into the white residential districts, but for years all their efforts were fruitless. During the last few years, however, they have been more successful; several streets, formerly white residential streets, have been given over to them, because as soon as the negro appears, the white man moves away. Druid Hill Avenue, a few years ago a white residential street, is now a negro street, and the city privileges from waste or encroach-

Large households are rare in Denver

(9 out of 10 homes = 3 or fewer people, of any age)

But people of color are far more likely to live with multiple adults

Black and brown households = 30% of all households in Denver, but account for over half of households with 3 or more adults and 72% of households with 5 or more adults.

Read public review draft of changes to residential use rules

These proposed text amendments to the Denver Zoning Code would update residential use regulations to increase housing opportunities and flexibility for many residents. The draft is available for a 30-day public review, followed by public hearings at the Denver Planning Board and City Council this fall.

About the Project

Denver has an immediate need for housing, and the city has made it a priority to address that need by working to make more options available for all residents. Updating zoning rules is one piece of the city's overall strategy to provide more and better housing opportunities for all residents.

The issues being addressed by this project have become even more urgent in the wake of the COVID-19 pandemic, job losses that are leading to a wave of evictions, the forthcoming loss of our existing community corrections resources, and our country's long-overdue awakening to issues of
